In 1904, he moved to New York City, where he worked for the New York Evening Post and the New York Tribune. In 1913, he joined the staff of the Saturday Evening Post, where he remained for the next 25 years.

Garrett quickly became one of the most popular and respected journalists in America. His writing was clear, concise, and witty, and he had a knack for getting to the heart of complex issues. He was also a fierce advocate for free market capitalism and limited government. Garrett believed that the New Deal was a dangerous experiment in socialism that would ultimately destroy American freedom and prosperity.

He continued to write and speak out against the growing power of the state, even when it cost him friends and supporters.

In 1938, Garrett left the Saturday Evening Post to start his own magazine, The American Mercury. The American Mercury quickly became a leading voice of the Old Right, a group of conservative intellectuals who opposed the New Deal and the growing power of the state. Garrett used The American Mercury to publish the work of some of the most important conservative thinkers of the day, including H.L. Mencken, Isabel Paterson, and Albert Jay Nock.

Garrett continued to write and speak out against the New Deal and the welfare state until his death in 1954.
