Born into a wealthy family in 1745, Hayne received a privileged education in England. However, his time abroad did not diminish his love for his homeland. Upon his return to South Carolina, he became an active participant in the growing movement for independence from British rule.

As tensions between the colonies and Great Britain escalated, Hayne joined the South Carolina militia and fought alongside his fellow patriots in the Battle of Sullivan's Island in 1776. The battle was a resounding victory for the Americans, but Hayne's joy was short-lived. In 1780, the British launched a full-scale invasion of South Carolina, and Charleston, the colony's capital, was captured.

Hayne refused to surrender to the British occupation. Instead, he fled into the countryside and rallied a band of loyalists to continue the fight for independence. For two years, he led a relentless guerrilla campaign against the British, harassing their supply lines and attacking their outposts.

Hayne's efforts were not in vain. He managed to disrupt the British occupation and keep the flame of resistance alive. However, his actions also made him a target for the British authorities. In January 1782, he was betrayed by a trusted associate and captured by British dragoons.

Hayne was imprisoned in Charleston and charged with treason. The trial was a sham, and the outcome was never in doubt. On August 4, 1782, Hayne was led to the gallows and hanged before a jeering crowd.

Hayne's execution sent shockwaves through South Carolina and beyond. It was a stark reminder of the brutality of the British occupation and the sacrifices that patriots were willing to make for their beliefs. Hayne's legacy lived on, inspiring others to continue the fight for independence.

In the years that followed, Hayne's execution became a symbol of the struggle for American liberty. His name was invoked by poets and orators, and his story was enshrined in historical accounts. Today, a monument stands in his honor in Charleston, and his sacrifice continues to be remembered and celebrated.
